What do you enjoy about being
Training Principal?

“

I began my own career here as a trainee, so I've experienced first-hand just how transformative the right support and opportunities can be. That perspective stays with me. Being Training Principal is a privilege because it allows me to shape that same journey for others: helping individuals move from those early, uncertain steps to becoming confident, commercially aware lawyers. What I find most rewarding is seeing that shift happen: when trainees start to trust their judgement, find their voice and really take ownership of their work. Being part of that progression, and watching it unfold over time, is what makes the role so rewarding.

What attributes help Mayer Brown trainees thrive at the firm?

The trainees who thrive here tend to combine curiosity with resilience and a genuinely collaborative mindset. Our work is intellectually demanding, so those who ask thoughtful questions, actively seek out feedback and take real ownership of their development quickly stand out.

What makes the biggest difference, though, is a willingness to step forward, whether that's by getting involved with clients early, working closely with colleagues across teams or embracing new challenges with energy. If you approach the role with that mindset, you don't just learn the technical skills, you build the confidence and perspective that will carry you through your career.
