

Craig Froelich Chief Information Security Officer

Craig Froelich is Chief Information Security Officer for Bank of America. He leads a team of 3,000 experts across 18 countries dedicated to protecting the financial data of the company's individual consumers, small- and middle-market businesses and large corporations.

The Global Information Security (GIS) team defends against current and future threats to the company, and partners closely with industry and government associations to ensure the security of the sector as a whole. GIS inventors have filed or been granted more than 1,000 cyber security patents. The team has won more than 100 awards including the 2022 Hot Company Security Team of the Year award from Cyber Defense Magazine and the 2018 Information Security Team of the Year from SC Magazine. Craig has also received industry awards for his leadership, including being named to the Top 100 Global CISO list and CISO of the Year numerous times and Breakaway Security Executive of the Year.

Before joining Bank of America in 2001, Craig held executive management roles at technology companies where he acquired a decade of experience in product management, application development and infrastructure management. He has been granted eight information security patents.

Craig serves as the chair of the Analysis & Resilience Center. He is a former chair and current member of the Financial Services–Information Sharing and Analysis Center's board of directors, and he is a former chair and current member of the Executive Committee of Financial Services Sector Coordinating Council. He also serves on the board of Sheltered Harbor and the executive committee of BITS, the technology policy division of the Bank Policy Institute.

He has long supported programs that narrow the gender gap in technology, serving as an executive sponsor for Girls Who Code. He is also the executive champion for the bank's neurodiversity program. Under Craig's leadership, the GIS team continues to strive for innovation through a commitment to diversity of talent, actively recruiting women, military veterans, people of color and members of the LGBTQ+ community.

Craig lives in Charlotte, NC with his wife and two children.
